

Define the Environment in Which You Were Raised and How it Impacted You

Camaraderie is one of the most important ingredients of a happy home. My childhood is filled with love and support, and my family never fell short of the main ingredient. Togetherness is a word that defines the environment in which I was raised, and this virtue molded me into the person I am today.

Through the course of my life, I have been blessed with a great home environment. I do not think I could have been given better parents. My Mom and Dad truly care about me and my sister - to an extreme. My parents attended every single sporting event, social event, and school function for both of us. They spent endless hours supporting our sports programs, helping us finish homework and projects, and driving us around Houston. Their dedication made me the student I am today. My future is strengthened by the long-lasting memory of my parents helping me study and pushing me to make the best grades possible; this nostalgia will be engrained in me forever. Moreover, this foundation pushed me forward into the next phase of my life. My home environment could not have been better: my parents and surrounding family were always present to motivate, pressure, and aid in my success.

Ever since I moved to Houston in 2002, togetherness united both my neighborhood and my community. My neighborhood gathered on the regular basis in the spirit of friendship. Whether we met on the cul-de-sac for a block party, a 4th of July fireworks celebration, or just a friendly game of kickball, there was never a time when the neighborhood felt divided. The same sense of family extended to the entire community. My school teachers, friends, and parents connected in earnest support. I have fond recollections of the school pizza nights or the trips to the football games where the community residents rallied around each other. Togetherness supported my growth and moved me upwards to the next big step in life.

Both my family and my community corroborated to have a sheer mass impact in my life. This culmination of support enabled me to reach my goal of a top-notch education. Without the influence of both my family and my community, my life would most certainly not be the same. Family, friends, and neighbors repeatedly endorsed the perspective that a higher success in life is granted through a college education. They were my cheerleaders that have driven me to work harder and persist when faced with obstacles that seem too difficult to overcome. Loved ones were always nearby that supported me throughout my life and pushed me through the hard times.

Togetherness is one of the most fundamental ingredients of life. This virtue ubiquitously spread its strength in all areas of my life, even when the support was not obvious. I am lucky to have these bonds with my family, neighborhood, and community. These connections made me who I am today and laid the foundation for the man I will be tomorrow.
